

The Revd Cameron Watt

Cameron was born within the sound of the bells of Lincoln Cathedral, served his curacy at St. Nicholas in Newport and is returning to the city to take up a role as a Self-Supporting Minister at St. Swithin's and St. Faith's. In his work life, Cameron supports Archdeacons across the Church of England and the Church in Wales as the Archdeacons' National Development Officer. He has been in this role part-time for the past four years, and has just recently taken this role on full-time.

Before ordination, Cameron had a wide range of jobs – from running a pub in Norfolk, working in a munitions factory (something which challenged his Christian values and understanding), before moving to the Environment Agency where he eventually became the head of Occupational Health and Wellbeing, leaving that role to be ordained.

Cameron has been committed to the life of the local churches in the diocese – as a lay minister and being a passionate supporter of our synodical system – both in Deanery Synods and at the Diocesan Synod. Alongside his national role, Cameron has also been an interim Priest-in-Charge in several parishes across the diocese, most recently in Louth, where he was also Rural Dean of Louthesk Deanery.

Cameron and his wife Sue have four wonderful daughters – three of them at university and one who has just joined the RAF, as well as his mum who lives around the corner from them. When not otherwise busy he enjoys lying in a hammock with a book, spending time in France, and dreaming of finally doing up his old MG which is sitting in the garage.
